Committee Reports

Conservation ~ Barbara Eskoz

This article is from the Nature Conservancy:

There is no doubt: our planet's climate is changing, and human activity — particularly our reliance on fossil fuels — is a primary culprit. The implications of climate change may seem overwhelming and irreversible, but we have some good news: Each of us has an opportunity to act — and to make a positive impact of our own.

Slowing climate change means reducing carbon emissions. Here are some quick and simple ideas for turning your personal carbon footprint into more of a "toe print:" Park the car for a few trips each week, and try walking, biking, telecommuting or public transportation. Be an energy-wise consumer. Food and goods require energy and water to grow, manufacture, package and transport. Buy less, toss less and buy local when you can.

Water takes energy to heat, treat and pump, so conserving water reduces emissions. Consider rain gardens, native landscaping and other water saving measures.

Research rebates, incentives and tax breaks for saving energy offered by many utilities.
